NEW USD COURSE FOR WOMEN STRESSES LEADERSHIP SKILLS

Typical management courses are traditionally taught by men, to men, using research data collected on men. But a new University of San Diego course, Leadership Development for Women, takes a new slant to the other gender.

"Women now account for 93% of the enrollment gain in management courses," said Dr. Johanna Hunsaker, course instructor, "and this course is designed to help women enter an organizational world still dominated by men."

The personal and organizational issues women face is to be examined, and skill-building will be provided through lectures, discussions, exercises, and simulation games.

Designed to give professional women in business and human services a repertoire of skills needed for work-related situations, this all-female course will develop leadership capabilities. Team-building skills, career strategy planning, assertiveness training, conflict management, politics, and management theories will be presented from a woman's point of view. Other topics include special leadership problems for women, role conflicts, dual career families, and sexual harassment.

The author of the forthcoming book, Management Skills for Women: Strategies for Success, Dr. Hunsaker holds a doctorate in organizational behavior and is a consultant to business and industry.
